

EARL WARREN PROFESSORSHIP

ACCEPTANCE BY MICHAL R. BELKNAP*

Thank you, Larry [Benner]. I am honored by what you have said about me. I am far more honored to be named as the first holder of California Western School of Law's Earl Warren Chair.

I cannot think of any greater accolade than to be linked in this way with the late Chief Justice of the United States. One invited guest who could not be here this evening, an economist and chaired professor at the Georgetown business school, Richard James Sweeny, reminded me that it has been almost forty-three years since we collected our bachelors' degrees from the University of California Los Angeles and marched off along somewhat different paths, both committed to becoming scholars.

Forty-three years ago, the Supreme Court that Justice Earl Warren led seemed to be remaking the country. To us, Justice Warren looked like a larger-than-life heroic figure. Michael Parrish has captured particularly well how he was viewed by our generation.

In October 1970, soon after retiring from the Supreme Court, Justice Warren came to a new university in La Jolla, California, to give a speech. As he began to speak, some students unfurled a large banner. Accustomed to the expletive-laced denunciations young people commonly hurled at anyone or anything associated with "the establishment," University of California San Diego administrators and professors cringed. When the sign came down, though, it proclaimed: "Right on Big Earl!"

Warren was someone with whom the increasingly disillusioned and even radicalized youth of my generation could identify. This was because he seemed to have done something to make the country better. What seemed important to those of us who chose to become

* Earl Warren Professor of Law, California Western School of Law. Adjunct Professor of History, University of California San Diego.

2009]

EARL WARREN PROFESSORSHIP

367

lawyers was that he had used the law to do it.

Earl Warren and I do not have a lot in common. He was a big bear of a man, while I rather obviously am not. He was a mediocre student, while Dick Sweeny and I busted our butts in pursuit of Phi Beta Kappa keys. He got his bachelor's and law degrees from the University of California Berkeley, while I always thought that California gold was meant to be worn with powder blue, that navy blue was for sailors, and that the University of California did not really come of age until John Wooden brought the first of his ten NCAA basketball championships home to Westwood in 1964.

Besides being Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court from 1953 to 1969, Justice Warren was the District Attorney of Alameda County, the Attorney General of California, a three-term governor of the state, and the 1948 Republican nominee for Vice President.

I, on the other hand, have been a professor pretty much my entire career. Justice Warren and I both served briefly as very junior Army officers during a war—Justice Warren served in World War I, and I served in Vietnam—without ever getting anywhere near the fighting.

There is only one really striking similarity between the Chief Justice and me. The “Super Chief” was a natural left-hander, who in an era when there was considered to be something wrong with southpaws, was forced to learn to write and eat with his right hand. I am also a southpaw. I throw left-handed, and am proud to report that Justice Warren also played sports with his naturally dominant left hand. That odd coincidence, however, is not enough to make me a fitting choice to be the first Earl Warren Professor.

What does, I hope, is my belief in the idea that Justice Warren came to symbolize for lawyers of my generation. Practically the first decision the Supreme Court handed down after Earl Warren became Chief Justice was Brown v. Board of Education.¹ Brown was followed by a plethora of legal landmarks, ranging from Miranda v. Arizona (with its requirement that police give warnings to suspects in custody before interrogating them),² to Reynolds v. Sims (the one-person, one-vote ruling),³ to decisions banning prayer and Bible reading from public school classrooms.

1. Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

2. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

3. Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964).

The constitutional law, criminal procedure, and federal jurisdiction casebooks of today are filled with Warren Court decisions. Entire branches of the law really begin with rulings of Warren's Court, some of them with opinions that he wrote. Most of his decisions had a common thrust: expanding the rights of society's outsiders, particularly members of racial minorities. A generation of lawyers came out of law school wanting to follow in the footsteps of the Warren Court: to litigate the next big case that would establish the next important right for the less fortunate.

Social scientists have now demonstrated that many of our assumptions were badly flawed. They have provided empirically grounded demonstrations that litigation did not do much to advance important social reforms, such as school desegregation. One legal historian has even written a massive and compelling book arguing that the civil rights movement that won equality for African Americans in the 1960s and 1970s was not so much inspired by Brown v. Board of Education,⁴ as it was the result of a reaction against it. Yet, in my role as a member of the California Western admissions committee, I read countless personal statements demonstrating that many students entering law school today still view law as an instrument for promoting positive change in society. I am pleased about that.

In his last public speech at Morehouse College, Earl Warren declared: "The great virtue of our government is that people can do something about it."⁵ That is especially true for lawyers.

As the first Earl Warren Professor, I hope to continually remind California Western students of this great virtue. I want students to come away from their legal education with the message of those UCSD undergraduates thirty-seven years ago imprinted on their brains: Right on Big Earl.

4. Brown, 347 U.S. at 483.

5. Earl Warren, Chief Justice, United States Supreme Court, Commencement Address at Morehouse College (May 21, 1974) in JACK HARRISON POLLACK, EARL WARREN: THE JUDGE WHO CHANGED AMERICA 321 (1979).